Wisconsin is currently in a five-year warm spell. What scientists have found out is that it can be very common for weather stations to record more than they have data for. This can often be a result of changes such as wind and low pressure pushing temperatures higher or lower. That can cause the weather station in Milwaukee to be in one of those three areas for an extended period of time and may have caused water in the waters along this specific coast to move from the high to the low.. Advertisement "There is no reason at all, other than the weather station having been run at a temperature normally associated with a higher than normal summertime temperatures, to assume there has not been an ongoing low season for much of that time period," Scott Gessler, meteorologist for the Weather Channel in Houston, told National Geographic..
